ABOUT THE PROGRAM

"In wartime, children suffer the most." * and globally, one in four children, or over 1.6 billion children currently live in a country affected by armed conflict, terrorism, or disaster. Parents are the mitigators of suffering for children but wars can adversely affect parenting. How well parents are able to maintain warmth, structure, discipline, monitoring and problem solving is associated with how children adjust, survive and recover from wartime conditions. Dr. Gewirtz will review the effects of the stressors of war on children and on parenting. She will talk specifically about the effect of a parent's wartime military experience and the impact of war exposure and flight on parenting. She will also talk about the effect of transition stressors on parenting and on children's adjustment. What can be done to help children and parents in the wake of war will be discussed and the few programs to support parenting that have been developed and tested will be described.

* United Nations International Children's Fund.
